

One of the most important issues was the question: Are we ready for older people to come? And that has been dealt with in the 59th session of the SEGG (Spanish Society of Geriatrics and Gerontology) in A Coruña.

Three experiences were presented that wanted to answer this question:

- Live participant: Cooperativa Trabensol, Madrid
- new centers for new senior citizens, new resources and programs? To accompany professional teams for the implementation and follow-up of a person-centered care model in gerontological complexes. Alicante
- Team sirimiri sociocultural services, vitoria-gastei

Contributions were made and it is a very interesting reflection aimed at changing attitudes:

- of people who care for the elderly
- Expand the approaches to give a more appropriate response
- raise changes in institutions and policies
- and, above all, to see that the profile of people who will reach senior citizens in the future have greater competition, training and therefore needs not only in the institutional framework of care and attention to dependency
- of society in general and greater interest in participating and not being excluded from the world.